JAPAN'S AIMS IN WAR AS TOLD BY K. K. KAWAKAMI

Noted Japanese Author, Well-known Here, Justified Nippon's Military Activity

By K. K. KAWAKAMI, Author of "Asia at the Door," Etc. (Karl K. Kawakami, noted Japanese author and well-known in Hawaii, has sent to the Star-Bulletin the following article on Japan's entry into the present war and her reasons for doing so. The article contains much information entirely new here as well as an exposition of Japanese aims from one of Nippon's deepest students and most sympathetic and forceful writers.)

With the dispatch of the Mikado's ultimatum to the Kaiser there seems to have been started in this country a movement aimed at the alienation of American sympathy from the Japanese. The contentions of those who regard the Japanese move with disfavor resolve into these three points: First, Japan thrust herself into the war without England's initiation.

Second, Japan has territorial ambition in China.

Third, Japan wants to "get even" with Germany.

Sympathy and loyalty for my native country impels me to express myself on these points. The first contention is not only unwarranted but false. Japan did not join hands with England without England's request. When it became evident that England must come to the rescue of France and Belgium, the press of Japan, without exception, hoped that Japan would not be called upon to aid her western ally. But the western ally did call upon Japan.

On August 3, that is, the day before England declared war on Germany, the British ambassador to Japan hurried back to Tokyo from his summer villa and immediately requested an interview with Baron Kato, foreign minister. At this conference the British ambassador informed Baron Kato that his government was compelled to open hostilities against Germany and desired to ascertain whether Japan would aid England in the event of British interests in the far east being jeopardized by German activities.

Baron Kato answered that the question before him was such a serious one that he could not answer it on his own account. On the evening of the same day Count Okuma convened a meeting of all the cabinet members. Bearing the resolution of this meeting, Baron Kato on August 4 called upon the British ambassador and told the latter that Japan would not shrink the responsibilities which the alliance with England put upon her shoulders.

At this time Japan did not expect to be called upon to aid England for at least a few months. But on August 7 the British ambassador suddenly asked for an interview with Baron Kato and told the foreign minister that the situation had developed in such a manner as to oblige England to ask for Japan's assistance without delay. On the evening of that day Premier Okuma requested the "elder statesmen" and his colleagues to assemble at his mansion. The conference lasted until 3 o'clock the next morning. Before it adjourned Japan's policy was definitely formulated.

What caused Downing Street to invite Japan's cooperation so soon is not clearly known to the outside world. But the Japanese press is in Self-probability right when it says that Japan and England were obliged to get promptly in order to frustrate the German scheme to transfer Kiaochow to the Chinese government before Germany was compelled to surrender. Had Germany succeeded in carrying out this scheme she would still have enjoyed, in virtue of Article 5 of the Kiaochow convention of 1898, the privilege of securing at some future time "a more suitable territory" in China. This was exactly the condition which the allies did not want to see established in China. If, on the other hand, Germany were forced to abandon Kiaochow by the armistice of the world, China would no longer be under obligation to "cede to Germany a more suitable place."

Now, as I think, what persuaded Japan and England to act promptly in the Far East. In the meantime a German cruiser, ignoring the rights of a neutral state, captured a Russian steamer within Japanese jurisdiction; a British gunboat, chased by another German cruiser, fled into a port only a hundred miles west of Tokyo; a number of British merchant vessels were either captured or chased by German warships; while a few Japanese ships were also intercepted by German cruisers. These activities of the German squadron were interpreted by Japan and England as disturbance to "general peace" in the Far East and to the "special interests" of the two countries in said region.

The second point, that Japan has territorial ambition, is easily disposed of. In proposing to restore Kiaochow to China, Japan is not actuated by altruistic motives but by motives of self-interest. Not that she wants to ingratiate herself with China but because she thinks her interests and safety can be best protected by preserving the territorial integrity of China.

Japan's strength lies in her isolated position, widely separated from the aggressive countries of the West. As England is trying to avoid the brunt of German aggressiveness by upholding the independence and integrity of the Netherlands, so Japan is anxious to maintain the territorial integrity of China, making it a sort of buffer state. This cherished aim of Japan has been partly frustrated because of German and Russian encroachments upon China. To protect her existence and safety against the designs of such ambitious powers Japan was compelled to occupy Korea and Port Arthur, thus making her territory contiguous to that of Russia. Today Japan feels more forcibly than ever the disadvantage of having such an aggressive nation as Russia as her neighbor, and she does not want to see another ambitious power establish itself upon Chinese soil.

This is the reason Japan does not wish to occupy Kiaochow or any other section of China. The logic is clear. Should Japan occupy Kiaochow permanently, other powers would surely follow Japan's suit and slice up for themselves large portions of Chinese territory. Should this come to pass, the powerful nations of the West would become Japan's immediate neighbors, thus inevitably weakening her naturally strong position. This means a larger army and a more powerful navy, with proportionately heavier burden of taxation. No sane Japanese can fail to see that the game is not worth the candle. It is only by maintaining the territorial integrity of China that Japan can enjoy peace and devote her energies to the promotion of the arts of peace.

The third point, that Japan wants to "get even" with Germany, contains much truth. Obviously, Japan has not forgotten the lessons which Germany taught her, and she thinks that the present is the opportune moment to return Germany's courtesy. Considering Germany's provocative attitude towards Japan during the past twenty long years, who can blame the Japanese? Japan sincerely believes that Germany is a disturbing element in the Far East and a constant menace to her safety.

Most Americans know how the Kaiser treated the Mikado at the end of the China-Japanese war which cost Japan a hundred thousand lives and a billion yen. Few, however, know that Germany's interference with the China-Japanese peace terms was only the first of the many unpleasant experiences which Japan has had with Germany.

The Germans today are diligently telling the public what enormous sums the Berlin government has expended for the rebuilding of Kiaochow, but compared with the sacrifice Japan offered upon the altar of Port Arthur, German expenditure of Kiaochow sinks into insignificance. Germany ousted Japan from Port Arthur because she wanted to give it to Russia so that she might take Kiaochow without Russia's objection. It was a game of give-and-take between the Kaiser and Kaiser. When the peace treaty was signed between Japan and China all Japan was celebrating; the next day the nation was in mourning because of the German advice compelling Japan to quit Port Arthur. Never has Japan's pride been so outraged as on that occasion. An officer destroyed himself in protest against the government's acquiescence in the German advice; several cut their fingers and with their own blood wrote memorials urging the government not to be bullied by the powers.

The German seizure of Kiaochow followed by the Russian occupation of Port Arthur, the British occupation of Weihaiwei, and the French occupation of Kwan-chow bay, was responsible for the Boxer disturbance of 1910. When the Boxers besieged the legations in Peking Japan immediately proposed to rush her troops to rescue the beleaguered foreigners. The Kaiser put his foot upon the Japanese overture and insisted that unless he was satisfied that Japan's action would by no means interfere with the interests of other nations he could not consent to the proposal.

The historic picture of the yellow peril painted by the Kaiser was disagreeable enough to the Japanese, but when the Japanese found the Kaiser secretly encouraging the Czar to muster his troops in Manchuria in the wake of the Boxer incident, they saw in him an imminent danger to their country. About this time the London Times published an article reporting the existence of a secret treaty by which the Kaiser was to render the Czar clandestine assistance in the event of a Russo-Japanese war.

When Japan was engaged in a life-and-death struggle in Manchuria, German attitude towards Russia was the virtual violation of neutrality. The German government, for example, permitted a German steamship company to sell a number of steamships to the Russian navy and to help Rostovsk's Baltic squadron secure coal en route to the Japan sea. What was more surprising, a German prince who was by Japan's special courtesy allowed to accompany the army to the front, was found secretly reporting to his government the activities of the Mikado's forces without permission of the censoring officers.

From such experiences the Japanese believe that the presence on Chinese soil of a German naval and military base is a constant menace to their country. Would that China could be far-sighted enough to see that her position can be strengthened only by co-operating with Japan. The two Asian nations should combine their strength to check territorial ambitions of western powers.

VICE-ADMIRAL GIVEN FOUR-YEAR SENTENCE

TOKIO.—Vice-admiral Koichi Fujii, who was accused of bribery in connection with the naval corruption case of last year, has been sentenced to imprisonment for a term of four years and six months.

Fujii was at one time naval attaché at Berlin. He was ordered before a court-martial in February of this year. It was alleged that he received illicit commissions for influencing the allotment of admiralty contracts in favor of a German firm.

"Listen, Eva," said the fond mother, "I've read to you about heaven and its beautiful golden streets." "Never mind, mamma," replied the little miss. "I'd rather wait until I get there and be surprised."
